Working as a science journalist

by Shelly Langton

§ 1. I work as a science journalist, writing articles about developments in science. I've always loved the subject and, having a degree in it, I know a lot about scientific theories and practices. My job is to make sure the public find out about the latest research. I'm one of the first people to find out from researchers about anything new and that's the best bit about what I do. The first time I saw my name on an article in a newspaper, it was amazing! I'm used to that now, though.

§ 2. Writing can be challenging. Sometimes, scientists' work is very complex and there are ideas and technical words that I have to work hard to understand. Even more difficult is being able to explain things in a way that someone who isn't a scientist can understand. You need to develop a way of writing that's easy for people to follow when they read a newspaper. Getting the right title is also important, as that's what makes people want to read the article. I'm not bad at those things now.

§ 3. If you work for a newspaper in their offices, you'll probably work from nine until five, which are normal office hours. I'm freelance, which means I write for different newspapers – thankfully, in the comfort of my own home. Often, articles have to be written quickly, so they can be published straightaway. This means working late to get things done, or I might have to miss a social occasion to get something finished. I knew that was part of the job when I started and it's fine because there are also times when I have nothing to write, and I can take a day off in the middle of the week.

§ 4. Friends always seem surprised when I say I'm flying abroad to talk to a scientist. But things happen all over the world. I'm attending a conference soon, which I'm pretty excited about as I haven't been to one before.
